[2] Fonts The word "font" is not used often to describe the typefaces you use for text, but it is a very important concept. There are thousands of fonts available, and many users are familiar with only a few of them. Unfortunately, most fonts are "canned" fonts—i.e., typefaces that come with a software package and may or may not be the best possible choices for a project. To take advantage of Photoshop's font functions, you must convert the typeface you want to use to a Font. There are many different ways to do this. Three general categories are listed below. [3] 1. General conversion. If you already have a font file, you can use Photoshop's font tools to convert it. Adobe Typekit is Adobe's solution for hosting fonts on the web. For most regular typefaces, there is a place where you can select the font you want and click the "Convert to Font" button. However, this dialog box is rather limited because it only allows you to convert certain fonts (mainly typefaces with a few glyphs, such as Arial) and to convert fonts in specific format (usually.otf,.tff, and.ttc). 2. Automatically install a set of fonts. After downloading a set of fonts, you can tell Photoshop to use that set automatically. For this to work, you must install them in a folder that is available to Photoshop. You can do that by right-clicking the folder that contains the font files, and choosing "Open with" and select "Adobe Typekit Installer" from the list. You can download an extensive set of fonts directly from Adobe's site. If you want to use a font that is not available from Adobe, you may be able to get it from another site or through a third-party font distributor. 3. Use a font converter. A program such as FontForge can convert one font format to another, and such programs are very easy to use. FontForge is simple to use because it has a wizard interface where you select the fonts to convert, and from there you can choose how to convert them. A good tutorial for using this program can be found at For some complex conversions, it may be better to use an online font converter, such as the one
