What's new:

Before Mod and Splash are gone its always good to remind ourselves that they were right all along. If everyone knew everything at once there would have never been an "Eldest Map" to begin with. In a way defeating the main goal for World of Tanks turns out to be a bit of a double edged sword. One the one hand the Pz VI's hunting power is cut down to a mere 5% reduction and the map width goes a little way towards making the air space in close proximity cleaner and more viable. On the other hand map awareness went up to 10%. Players are more confident with their situational awareness of the fog of war (and a bit more cute it is as well) and being aware of a larger area with increased possibilities of acknowledging a tank, its visual characteristics and abilities paints a more complete picture of a given tank. Enjoy this ramble. The Dictatorship goes unnoticed but it is on the back burner this week. On the 25th of August Michael Bourne of Sector 45.tv will be digging into the format and support situation on Xbox One. Before we are able to take a look at the format, I want to mention that you can follow @Sector45 on Twitter for daily updates in the sector. To give an intro I will explain an Invite. Invites have always been an important part of the game. The reputation of the tanks, their visual characteristics and their abilities play a key role in that. In that regard, can you imagine players in World of Tanks talking about the A-10 Thunderbolt, much less trying to get their hands on one during a clan battle? After all, it's a 90's jet fighter and nobody wants to play with them in the east. Even if they were playing a random match, not even the devs or the community can say if a player plays on the A-10 or just a random tank with a shaved head. During World of Tanks Tournament season invites are a great way to tell which player is the best in a given clan (and sometimes the best in a given region) for one moment and you can compare the results. Invites are also a great way to form teams that can go to battle and frequently come back victorious in the ranking or the championship match or whatever you want to call it. An Invite is different from a matchmaker on line in one respect. There is no limit on the number of players an invitation can request. Another,
