The mechanism of the synthesis of ceria nanoparticles through hot filtration was studied by in situ electron diffraction, in situ dark field transmission electron microscopy (DF-TEM) and in situ X-ray diffraction. In situ DF-TEM observations of the formation of ceria nanoparticles in the original substrate showed that the size and morphology of the ceria nanoparticles were controlled by the particle growth mechanism. In situ X-ray diffraction was used to identify the main reactions during the formation of ceria nanoparticles in the temperature range of 800-1000 degrees C. The results show that CeO2 and Ce(3)O(4) were formed initially, and the transformation between the two was promoted by the interaction of the hot particle and the substrate. The reaction-facilitated formation of ceria nanoparticles at 800 degrees C on silica-coated substrates was favored by the surface interaction and diffusion of Ce and O. The particles grew, but were maintained in a metastable state at higher temperatures due to the limited supply of oxide species and the difficulty of consuming available oxygen species.E3 2014: Xbox One and Xbox One S Teaser Released by Microsoft Microsoft has launched an official teaser for their upcoming Xbox One and Xbox One S at E3 2014.
